Are you teaching 9-12. If so, say hello and connect with the other high school trainers. Feel free to share where you're from, what grade level(s) and subjects you teach, and all the exciting projects that you did with your students this year or the fun plans you have for your classes next year. :) Salaries for private school teachers have historically been lower than in the public sector. Years ago, teachers accepted a position in private school for less money simply because they felt that the learning environment was friendlier and more privileged. Many trainers also came to the private sector because they thought it was a mission or an invitation. Regardless, private schools have had to compete with a smaller number of well-qualified teachers. The salaries of public school teachers have risen significantly and their benefits remain excellent, including strong pension packages. The same applies to the salary of some private teachers, but not all. While some elite private schools now pay very close to what public schools pay, or even more, not everyone is able to compete at this level. According Payscale.com, starting in October 2018, the average elementary school teacher will make $35,829 and the average high school teacher will make $44,150. Private school teachers in non-religious institutions earn quite a bit more, according to Payscale: the average elementary non-religious school teacher makes $45,415 and the average high school teacher earns $51,693 a year. As you might expect, there are differences in private school teacher salaries. In terms of the low end of compensation, the spectrum is parochial and boarding schools. At the other end of the scale are some of the best independent schools in the country. Parochial schools often have teachers who follow the profession, more than after the money. Boarding schools offer significant benefits, such as housing, so teachers tend to change significantly less on paper. The country's top private schools have often been in business for decades, and many have large endowments and a loyal alumni base from which to receive support. In most private schools, the cost of tuition does not cover all the costs of educating a student; schools depend on charitable giving to make up for this difference. Schools with the most active alumni and parents typically offer higher salaries to teachers, while schools with lower endowments and annual resources may have lower salaries. The common misconception is that all private schools carry high tuition and have a multimillion-dollar endowment, and therefore must offer high wages. But the overheads that these private schools carry, including sprawling campuses that span hundreds of acres of multiple buildings, state-of-the-art athletics and arts facilities, dormitories and dining rooms in the Commons that offer three meals a day, shows that costs can be justified. The difference from school to school can be great. The interesting trend involves boarding school salaries, which have typically been lower than their day school counterparts. Boarding schools typically require faculty to live on campus for free in a school provided in a residential area. Since housing is generally about 25-30 percent of a person's living expenses, it's often an important perk. This benefit is particularly valuable for high cost housing in parts of the country, such as the Northeast or southwest. But this benefit also comes with additional responsibilities because boarding school teachers are usually asked to work more hours, taking dorm parent, mentoring, and even evening and weekend monitoring roles.
